Details:Chicago Police Department, assigned to the Marine Unit. On June 2, 2000, Sergeant Stoffregen was participating in a "search-and-rescue" training mission about a mile away from the Lake Michigan shore. Sgt. Stoffregen had completed a 35-minute diving practice session and signaled to her diving partner that she was going to return to the boat. When she reached the water's surface, she was met by crushing, three-foot waves. As she attempted to reach the Chicago Marine boat, her efforts and those of the officer onboard were impeded by the force of the waves. A second Marine Unit boat responded and assisted in her rescue. The officers immediately rushed her to a waiting ambulance. She was transported to Northwestern Memorial Hospital where she died an hour later. Doctors concluded that panic, fatigue, and exhaustion attributed to Sergeant Stoffregen's accidental drowning. Sergeant Stoffregen's funeral mass was held at St. Nicholas of Tolentine Catholic Church. She is survived by her mother, Agnes; five brothers: Kenneth, Gale, Ronald, Timothy and James and a sister, MaryBeth.

Police Diver Dies in Accident

The Associated Press, Fri 2 Jun 2000

CHICAGO (AP) — A veteran police department diver died Friday after experiencing problems during a practice deep-water dive in Lake Michigan, police said.

Sgt. Alane Stoffregen, 50, a diver for the police marine division, reported trouble at around 12:30 p.m., police spokesman Pat Camden said. Her partner took her back to their boat about a mile from shore and began administering CPR, Camden said.

She died less than an hour later at Northwestern Memorial Hospital. The cause of death is being investigated, Camden said. Stoffregen was rated as a master diver and dove frequently on her own time, he said.

Stoffregen's partner, a 50-year-old man whose name was not released, was also taken to the hospital and was in good condition.

The incident was under investigation.

On Friday, June 2 Sgt. Alane Stoffregen died and another police officer was injured in a training exercise in Lake Michigan, near the Jardine water purification plant.

Sgt. Stoffregen, who was pronounced dead at approximately 1320 Hrs. was a recent member of the departments dive team. The other officer was in good condition at Northwestern Hospital. No additional information was given about the incident.

A Chicago police sergeant recently assigned to the Marine Unit died Friday during a deep-water training exercise in Lake Michigan about a mile off Navy Pier.

Alane Stoffregen, 50, was newly assigned to the unit, but that may not have been a factor in her death since she held the title of master diver, officials said. "We have no idea what happened, but to assume it was an accident is premature," police spokesman Pat Camden said. "What if she had a heart attack or an embolism or aneurysm? We have to wait and find out what the medical examiner says."

Stoffregen had been on the force since February 1978 and was promoted to sergeant in June 1999. She was assigned to the Marine Unit about a month ago.

Another officer involved in the training exercise, also 50, was expected to be released Friday from Northwestern Memorial Hospital after being treated for exhaustion for trying to rescue the woman who died.

OFFICER'S DEATH IN DIVING EXERCISE PROBED

A Chicago police sergeant who died Friday in a scuba-diving exercise was new to the department's marine unit but was a longtime diving enthusiast who had earned certification as a master diver.

Police on Saturday continued to investigate the death of Alane N. Stoffregen, 50, during a training exercise in Lake Michigan about a mile offshore. Stoffregen and her partner, whom police would not identify Saturday, were diving in 30 to 35 feet of water. About 12:30 p.m., something went wrong. "She started experiencing some problems during the dive," said police spokesman Joseph Bourgoyne. "There's a lot of [information] we don't have."

The boat rushed both divers back to shore. Stoffregen died less than an hour later at Northwestern Memorial Hospital. Her partner also was taken to the hospital and was reported in good condition.

Marine unit officers would not comment on the incident Saturday. The Cook County medical examiner's office is conducting an autopsy, police said. Stoffregen grew up on Chicago's Southwest Side, graduating from Jones Commercial High School and St. Xavier University, said her sister-in-law, Debbie Stoffregen.

Alane Stoffregen joined the police force in 1978 and worked as a patrol officer, a 911 operator and a youth services officer, her sister-in-law said. Stoffregen received a fitness award, 47 honorable mentions and four complimentary letters from her superiors, police said. She became a sergeant in June 1999.

Stoffregen joined the marine unit about a year and a half ago but had to leave when she became a sergeant because the unit could have only so many officers at that rank, her sister-in-law said. Weeks ago, she was able to rejoin the unit. "She really wanted to be on the marine unit," Debbie Stoffregen said.

Master divers have completed two to three months of training, can dive in all depths of water and know how to perform underwater rescues, said Chuck Miller, president of the Illinois Council of Skin and Scuba Divers.

Equipment failures are relatively rare in diving, Miller said. He said divers sometimes suffer heart or other medical problems while exerting themselves. Stoffregen was a member of the Beverly Theatre Guild, sometimes dancing or acting in guild performances, her sister-in-law said. "You could always count on Alane if you ever needed anything done," Debbie Stoffregen said. "I'm sure that's why she got into the Police Department--community service, helping out."

Full-honor burial now considered for officer

June 5, 2000 By Kristen McQueary Staff Writer

Chicago police officials said late Sunday the department may indeed bury an officer with full honors who died Friday in a diving exercise.

Family members of Sgt. Alane Stoffregen, 50, a 22-year department veteran, were upset after learning that Stoffregen's death was being classified as a performance-of-duty death, rather than a death in the line of duty.

A performance-of-duty death does not merit full honors by the department, which includes a special ceremony and the police department covering the cost of the burial.

But Chicago Police Department spokesman Matthew Jackson said police Supt. Terry Hillard may overrule the decision to bury Stoffregen without full honors. Her funeral is scheduled for Wednesday. "The superintendent has the right to override that decision," Jackson said. "It's being discussed. The department is looking into it. I'm almost certain (Hillard) will speak out on this."

A death in the line of duty occurs when an officer is killed by an act of violence committed by another person. If an officer dies in a nonviolent situation, like a traffic accident or a heart attack on the job, the death is considered a performance of duty death, Jackson said.

Stoffregen died Friday afternoon during a training exercise about a mile east of Navy Pier in Lake Michigan. An experienced diver, Stoffregen started showing signs of distress after signaling she was coming to the surface, police officials said.

She was given CPR immediately and rushed to Northwestern Hospital where she was pronounced dead at 1:17 p.m.

She began her career with the department in 1978 and was promoted to sergeant in June last year. She was recently reassigned to the marine unit after requesting the transfer.

Police officials said it was highly unlikely she drowned, because of her experience in diving. Autopsy results are pending.

Hillard changes mind on diver's funeral

A Chicago police sergeant who died last week in a deep-water diving exercise in Lake Michigan will get a full-honors funeral, after all.

The family of Sgt. Alane Stoffregen had complained, along with a group that represents sergeants, after being notified over the weekend that she would not receive the high-profile send-off. The holdup, they were told, was that Stoffregen was not officially "killed in the line of duty," in an act of violence. That automatically accords an officer a full-honors funeral.

Stoffregen "died in the performance of duty," the result of a nonviolent incident. But police Supt. Terry Hillard said he would give her an honors funeral anyway. "There are no words or sentiments that make the loss of Sgt. Stoffregen any less painful," Hillard said Monday.

Sgt. Alane M. Stoffregen, a Chicago police rescue diver who spent a lifetime relaxing and playing near the water, boating on top of it, swimming in it and diving beneath its surface, died Friday, June 2, shortly after diving in Lake Michigan on a training exercise.

Sgt. Stoffregen, 50, had been a mile offshore and underwater for half an hour when she calmly signaled to her partner that she was heading for the surface. Once there, she began showing signs of distress, said her brother Timothy, himself a recreational diver. She was pronounced dead in Northwestern Memorial Hospital shortly after that, though an exact cause was not yet known.

he was certified as a master diver and was an expert in open water navigation, underwater first aid and rescue. Her first dive was in 1984, as part of a basic scuba course through the Chicago Park District. Only the week before the accident, she had returned from a diving vacation to Aruba, her family said.

"She always liked the water; it just seemed like it was always second nature to her," said Sgt. Stoffregen's sister, MaryBeth Murphy. "The whole time we were growing up, it seemed like she always wanted to be at the beach, or in the water, or in a boat."

Born in Chicago and raised on the Southwest Side, Sgt. Stoffregen was the oldest of seven children, an active girl who developed early interests in dancing and water sports that lasted throughout her life. At the same time, she had a creative drive that led to intense, though short-lived, fascinations with such things as working in stained glass and making pottery.

Beginning in the late 1960s, and then continuing for many years, Sgt. Stoffregen worked as a dance instructor. Her first dancing jobs were with a dance troupe that toured and performed at state fairs, followed in 1971 with a stint in the USO, performing at military bases across the United States.

"Four chicks among a sea of men," remembered Pat O'Brien, a childhood friend and dancer who accompanied Sgt. Stoffregen on the tours. Not the least bit fazed by the experience, Sgt. Stoffregen had a love for dance and the theater that led to a long relationship with area grade schools and high schools, choreographing their dance shows. She volunteered backstage for a community theater group in the Beverly neighborhood since 1988, receiving a distinguished service award from the Beverly Theater Guild in 1999 for her work both on and off the stage.

A graduate of Jones Commercial High School, Sgt. Stoffregen earned her associate's degree from Daley College in 1977 and took the police exam with two of her brothers the following year. She was accepted onto the force, and over the next two decades took her place among the growing number of women in the department.

She drove a squad car and later worked in a tactical unit on the Southwest and Near West Sides. She did stints as a 911 dispatcher and as an investigative specialist in the inspector general's office. She earned a bachelor's degree in criminal justice from St. Xavier University in 1987, and she landed in the police Marine Unit for the first time in the mid-1990s. In 1998, she made detective and worked briefly in property crimes on the West Side. Last year, she became a sergeant and was assigned to a police district on the Southeast Side.

But since she first left the Marine Unit and after her subsequent promotion, said her family, Sgt. Stoffregen had been waiting for a sergeant's position to open up with the unit.

"She made curtains for the dive boat so she could have privacy when she changed," her sister said. "She wanted to make that boat her home, I think."

The chance to return to the Marine Unit came up just before Memorial Day; relatives said. Rejoining it was never a question for her.

"She was passionate about everything she did," said O'Brien. "When she dived, that was her passion. When she danced, that was her passion. And it wasn't just her--she got you interested, too. She sucked you into her vortex, and you got as excited about it as she did."

Additional survivors include her mother, Agnes; and four other brothers, Kenneth, Gale, Ronald and James.

Visitation will be from 2 until 9 p.m. Tuesday in the Blake-Lamb Funeral Home, 4727 W. 103rd St., Oak Lawn. A St. Jude police service will be held at 7 p.m. Tuesday in the funeral home.

A mass will be said at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday in St. Nicholas of Tolentine Catholic Church, 3721 W. 62nd St., Chicago.

Police diver likely exhausted

<http://www.suntimes.com/output/news/dive15.html>

August 15, 2000 BY FRANK MAIN STAFF REPORTER

Chicago police diver Alane Stoffregen drowned in Lake Michigan in June probably after becoming exhausted in a struggle to board a boat during a training exercise, a pathologist in the Cook County medical examiner's office said Monday.

Dr. Scott Denton said the circumstances of Stoffregen's death raise questions about training procedures. But the Police Department said it would not comment until reviewing the medical examiner's report.

Stoffregen died June 2 during deep-water training about a mile off Navy Pier. The 50-year-old sergeant had joined the police Marine Unit about a month before her death and was listed as a master diver.

She came to the surface while her male diving partner was about 35 feet under water, Denton said, adding that another diver was waiting in a boat. "He did not know she was there until she yelled his name," Denton said. "She may have been struggling before he helped her."

Stoffregen's respirator was out of her mouth as she fought 2- to 3-foot-waves on the lake, but the diver in the boat was unable to pull her out of the water, Denton said.

Another boat arrived "several minutes later" to remove her, he said. Tests showed Stoffregen's equipment was working properly and that no drugs or alcohol were in her system, Denton said.

Dr. James Caruso of the U.S. Navy hospital in Pensacola, Fla., reviewed the case and agreed she accidentally drowned at the surface, probably because of exhaustion, Denton said. "I would think this would have some implications in the future for training," Denton said.

Dr. Peter Bennett, a Duke University professor and president of the Divers Alert Network, said divers over age 40 are most prone to surface drowning. "This is certainly something diving pathologists know about," he said. Bennett said a common cause of surface drowning is heart trouble triggered by the change in surface temperature on a diver's face. But any changes in Stoffregen's heart rhythm before she drowned were not detected in the autopsy, Denton said.

Bennett said one or two U.S. divers each year drown at the water's surface.

PANIC, FATIGUE CALLED FACTORS IN JUNE DEATH OF POLICE DIVER

Rough waters, exhaustion and panic contributed to the drowning earlier this summer of a 50-year-old diver with the Chicago Police Department's Marine Unit, according to the findings of the Cook County medical examiner's office and a U.S. Navy doctor.

The information was provided to the Chicago Police Department, which is reviewing the circumstances of the June 2 death of Sgt. Alane Stoffregen, who drowned during a diving exercise 1 mile off the Lake Michigan shoreline. Chicago police spokesman Pat Camden said Tuesday that proper procedures were followed, "but anytime there's a death in a training exercise, obviously, you need to look at the causes."

Dr. James Caruso, a pathologist with the U.S. Naval Hospital in Pensacola, Fla., studied the autopsy report and a police report and concluded that Stoffregen probably was exhausted as she tried to board a boat bouncing in 2 to 3 foot waves.

At the surface, she failed to follow a standard safety practice of keeping her oxygen regulator in her mouth, and she likely panicked as she tried to breathe while waves were beating at her face, he said. "She took a bit of a beating trying to get into the boat," Caruso said.

Serious scrapes and bruises on her head and neck were apparently caused from her body colliding with the boat, said a spokesman for the medical examiner's office. Her rescue was also delayed by a few minutes because the officer on the boat was unable to lift Stoffregen, who weighed almost 200 pounds, out of the lake until another boat was summoned to assist, he said. Stoffregen was a master diver, and she met the swimming qualification to work with the Marine Unit, Camden said. Employees with the Police Department are not required to meet any height or weight standards, Camden said.

Stoffregen, a 22-year police force veteran, had joined the Marine Unit a month before her death, Camden said.

Police looking at Marine Unit after diver's death in June

September 6, 2000 BY FRANK MAIN CRIME REPORTER

Police Supt. Terry Hillard is exploring whether more officers and equipment are needed for the department's Marine Unit after the death of a police diver this summer.

Sgt. Alane Stoffregen drowned June 2 about a mile off Navy Pier as she struggled to board a boat during a training exercise. "The superintendent is reassessing staffing and equipment for the Marine Unit" because of the accident, Tom Needham, Hillard's chief of staff, said Tuesday.

Her death raised questions about whether enough officers were in place to support Stoffregen and another diver in the water, officials said. An officer manning the boat was unable to pull her to safety.

Another boat took several minutes to come to the rescue, investigators found. The police Marine Unit, which patrols Lake Michigan and the Chicago River, has five boats, two of which are being repaired, and about 25 divers, Sgt. Robert Vanna said.

Colo. group to train city's police divers

<http://www.suntimes.com/output/news/dive09.html>

September 9, 2000 BY FRANK MAIN CRIME REPORTER

A Colorado organization will train Chicago's police divers in the wake of Sgt. Alane Stoffregen's death in a June diving accident.

Dive Rescue International of Fort Collins, Colo., will give a basic diving course for members of the police marine unit in October. Several officers later will receive advanced training to become certified as instructors.

"This is something that was discussed before the incident with Sgt.

Stoffregen, but it was accelerated because of the incident," police spokesman David Bayless said.

In addition to Lt. Earl Zuelke Jr., the leader of the marine unit, there are four sergeants certified to dive, as well as 26 officers. Zuelke said he has requested an increase from 31 to 40 officers in the 2001 budget. He said he also would like to bolster the number of boats in the unit from five to seven.

The new training and the request for more equipment and staff come at a time when the marine unit is moving to a year-round operation. In the past, the unit patrolled waterways from April to November, Zuelke said.

Stoffregen died June 2 in a training exercise about a mile off Navy Pier. She became exhausted while trying to board a boat manned by one officer, who was unable to pull her in, investigators found.

"Alane's a good friend of mine," Zuelke said. "I initially certified her 15 years ago. . . . This was a pretty hard reality check."

Zuelke would not say how much the new training will cost, except that it will be "thousands of dollars

Family fights to have officer's star retired

<http://www.suntimes.com/output/news/star31.html>

January 31, 2001 BY FRANK MAIN STAFF REPORTER

Relatives of a Chicago police sergeant who drowned in a diving accident are urging Supt. Terry Hillard to retire her star--almost eight months after they successfully battled the department to give her a full honors funeral.

Her family hopes Hillard will place Sgt. Alane Stoffregen's star in a display case at headquarters at 35th and Michigan, even though department policy limits the honor to officers killed in shootings or other violent acts. "She was doing her job," said her brother, Ron Stoffregen, a Chicago firefighter. "What other recognition would we expect?"

The department did not put her star on display, because she died in the "performance of duty" and was not killed in the line of duty, said Sgt. Robert Cargie, a police spokesman. "This is not to diminish the importance of Sgt. Stoffregen's contribution to the department," Cargie said. "In fact, we extol that contribution."

The department originally denied Stoffregen an honors funeral on the same basis. But Hillard changed his mind after her family and a sergeants group complained.

Officers are killed in the line of duty when they die from an act of violence committed by another person, Cargie said. An officer dies in the performance of duty from a nonviolent cause such as a heart attack or car accident, he said.

Stoffregen, a 22-year police veteran, died June 2 in Lake Michigan during a training exercise for police divers about a mile off Navy Pier. She became exhausted while trying to board a boat and drowned, the Cook County medical examiner's office ruled.

Ron Stoffregen said the department contacted his family Friday and told them his sister's star would not be retired. Representatives of the Chicago Police Sergeants' Association said they met Monday with Hillard. "His argument was that Alane did not die at the hands of another," said Sgt. James McMullin, chairman of the association. "We are very upset."

McMullin said the superintendent should decide whether to retire a star on a case-by-case basis, instead of relying on a narrow definition. But Cargie said the definition is intended to avoid confusion.

Family members said they were particularly upset when they were invited to an Oct. 7 ceremony dedicating a new display case for retired stars. They were disappointed when Alane Stoffregen's star was not there, Ron Stoffregen said. "The invitation was in deference and respect" to Stoffregen's family, Cargie responded.

A LEGACY OF Giving

Quietly, often without recognition, Saint Xavier University benefactors and recipients help one another realize their full potential. Civic service has long characterized the Stoffregen family. So it seemed only natural that brothers Gale and Ronald would establish a scholarship in honor of their sister, Alane, an alumna of Saint Xavier and a sergeant in the Chicago Police Department Marine Unit who died while on duty. With the Sgt. Alane M. Stoffregen Scholarship Fund, their sister's concern for the well-being of others continues. Gale notes, "Alane would be ecstatic to know that another woman is pursuing a career in criminal justice as a result of her support."

With the support of the Alane Stoffregen Scholarship, one of this past year's winners, Melissa Duffy '06, has set her sights on the future. In 20 years she would like to be a judge. "Today's criminal justice system is riddled with problems. I want to help develop solutions."

It's this kind of concern for others that motivates both Saint Xavier benefactors and students. When Dr. Emelie Ilarde '91 received the Presidential Scholarship, she was a chemistry major with hopes of becoming a physician. The scholarship allowed her to focus on academics and not worry about working to cover living expenses. At present she is a family physician actively involved in training and mentoring residents and medical students. "I have realized my true privilege and hope to continue touching lives generously, competently and with compassion."
